KNEISEL QUARTET IN BRUCKNER WORK

String Quintet Has First Hearing Here Twenty Years respects well executed.

In the Mozart sonata some heaviness of tone and style precluded the achievement of a highly pollahed delivery, and in the sonata by Beethoven the same qualities were at times apparent as well as technical inaccuracies, shown chiefly After Writer's Death.

CHARACTER REFLECTIVE

It Possesses a Poetic Quality and a Strong Personal Note.

The second concert of the Kneisel Quartet took place last evening in Acolian Hall. The programme comprised Anton Bruckner's string quintet in M major, Mozart's B flat quartet, opus 589 in the Koechel list, and Tschaikowsky's F major quartet, opus 22. The assisting viola player in the Bruckner work, which calls for two violas, was had elapsed after his death before one of his most important compositions in the field of chamber music found its way to the local platforms.

The slow movement of the quintet is finely feit and wrought out with beautiful expression. It is reflective and perhaps somewhat introspective, as most of this writer's music is, but it has poetic quality and a strong personal note. Furthermore it technically excels the other three movements in the fluency and spontaneity of its treatment of the five instruments and in the unforced nature of its harmonic plan.
